

RESTROOM LAWS

To all who are required by the law to attend school:

Do the policies in your school demand that you ask permission to be allowed to use the restroom?
If so, you are working under tyranny. It is time for change.

The power is in your hands to change what surrounds you. The school system has no control over you because the choice to obey is always yours. If you want to make lasting changes, though, you need to work together in large numbers. If you and only a few other people choose not to obey, the faculty will try to intimidate you and your family until you obey or get expelled while the policies stay. However, if you and many other people choose not to obey, the faculty will change their behavior and the policies so that the school doesn't fall apart. The school cannot afford to stay open without the support of many of its students because your participation represents money.

The most effective thing you can do to change the restroom policies is to never ask permission. You don't ask to sneeze, blink, or scratch an itch -- why would you ask to empty your bladder and bowels? The policies demand you to ask permission so that you don't miss an important part of the lesson, and so that you don't disrupt the class. There is a fundamental problem with these policies: they don't trust you to be a human capable of making educated, respectful choices. Instead, they assume that you are ignorant, disrespectful, and unchanging. Security may also be a reason, but your school is not nearly as secure as many people have been lead to believe.

You are fully capable of understanding what is important to you in the lesson, and you likely know how to respectfully leave the classroom. You are the only person who truly knows when you need to use the restroom. If the faculty tries to "punish" you, then they are being disrespectful to the fact that your body doesn't run on a clock. Also, they are ignoring that you don't need their particular lessons in order to be successful. Enforced, systemized education usually holds you back from your true potential. The current school system is an industry designed to standardize you, but there are no standard people.

If you want, you can eventually destroy the school system as we know it and replace it with something you want. Education is very important because it empowers you. The present school system cannot fully empower you because you are demanded to attend whether you want to or not. By working on a simple matter like restroom policies, it will be easy for you and many people to agree on the same thing and act on it quickly. After you organize, it's okay to be one of the few people courageous enough to start the change. Once others see you do it, they will follow. There are leaders for every cause.

Non-violent non-cooperation is the key. No matter what anybody tells you, do not give in. Ignore them if you have to. If you are asked where you're going, tell the truth. If you are told to stop, keep going. If your family punishes you for it, you still don't have to obey. If your family is physically violent towards you, find somewhere you can be safe. Don't worry. As this movement grows, you will find more support. You might have to push hard in the beginning, but many hands will make light work.

Talk to each other. Set a particular day or week to start. Spread the word as much as you can. Stick to your goals. Never stop.

Respectfully Yours, Brandon R. Farmer – on the web: invertedsphere.com/restroom